

Amanda Dingman

October 2, 2014

Sexual Assault Victims

Source #2 Hampton, David J. Sociology Department, State University of New York. Web. 2 Oct. 2014. <http://www2.potsdam.edu/alcohol/Controversies/1109127234.html#.VC22W0tH3II>
Reflections/Questions I like this article because I can easily use it against the other one to defend how alcohol isn't a woman's fault at all and how people should stop blaming the woman for sexual assault to even happen to her. However, I feel as though these articles were written for very different purposes so I don't know how I feel about comparing the two.	Notes/Summary The author of this article wrote about the effects of alcohol in one's system and how it corresponds with sexual assault. Hampton, the author, discusses alcohol as a whole and how "putting alcohol into your system does not cause you to commit a sexual assault anymore than putting gasoline into your car causes you to drive to the airport" (3). He talks about how when under the influence, people only do things that they have thought about doing while they were sober, so alcohol messing with someones thoughts cannot necessarily be blamed for what one does when influenced by it.